Research Summary

Ph.D. Work:

The focal aim of my Ph.D. work was based on “Adolescents stress: recognition and management” with the objectives, to identify the extent of academic stress, self concept stress, role stress, family stress and vocational stress experienced by adolescents, factors causing stress, coping strategies adopted by adolescents, impact of gender and socio-economic status on stress and coping strategies adopted by adolescents, to recommend strategies for combating stress. For this study, I examined total sample of 300 adolescents from 6 schools of Lucknow district India, wherein 150 boys and 150 girls were selected for the present study. Hundred fifty boys and equal number of girls were further divided into 50 respondents each belonging to lower, middle and upper socio-economic status. For the study Bisht Battery of Stress Scale by Abha Rani Bisht(2012), Socio-economic scale by Kuppu Swami(2012) and self structured questionnaires on stress causing factors and stress coping strategies were used. From the study findings it was concluded that male and female adolescents across socio-economic groups were suffering from moderate level of stress in all significant spheres which have been considered in the study i.e. academic stress, self concept stress, role stress, family stress and vocational stress. Findings also revealed that academic stress and self concept stress, was not affected by gender and socio-economic status while role stress and family stress was affected by gender but not by socio-economic status only family anxiety was neither affected by gender nor socio-economic status. Vocational stress-frustration, pressure and anxiety were not affected by gender and socio-economic status but vocational conflict was affected by gender, not by socio-economic status. It was found that the most frequently stress causing factors were family, school performance, peer pressure, physical appearance, future plans, heterosexual relationships and school/leisure conflict. Spending time with family to de-stress has been identified as the most preferred coping strategy adopted by the adolescents. No impact of gender was found in stress coping strategies of the adolescents.
